There are many reasons why people like having friends. Friends are usually close in age. They are from similar families. They have got similar interests and hobbies. Maybe they can watch sports together or talk about art. One interesting influence on friendship is a psychological effect called reciprocity. This just means that when someone likes you, you probably like them too.

Popularity and attractiveness can also be influential. People like being friends with popular, attractive people. Sharing secret information about yourself (at an appropriate moment) is important for friendship.

Location is very important: people are friends with the people they can see every day, at work or at school. It's very difficult to have long-distance friends.

1. In general, friends' families are very different.

In general, friends' families are very similar.

2. Friends haven't got similar interests and hobbies.

3. Reciprocity is when you like people but they don't like you.

4. Popularity or attractiveness isn't important to friends.

5. Friends don't like sharing secrets.

6. Long-distance friendships are very common.
